

Internet and Technology Addiction: The Addict's Experience & Therapeutic Strategies

Joshua Germain, MA, LMHC

The image shows three paintbrushes with gold ferrules and dark handles, resting on a palette. The palette is covered in vibrant, textured paint in shades of blue, green, and red. The brushes are arranged diagonally from the top left towards the bottom right. The brush in the foreground has a thick coating of yellow paint. The brush in the middle has a thick coating of green paint. The brush in the background has a thick coating of blue paint. The background is a soft, out-of-focus gradient of colors, suggesting a larger painting or a studio setting.

DSM-5 Proposed Criteria for Internet & Gaming Disorder

A) Users are involved in repetitive use of video games with other players over the Internet with impairment in lifestyle functioning. B) Criteria must be met over the past 12 months; C) Five of the following types of criteria must be present:

1. Compulsive or obsessive engagement or preoccupation with Internet gaming.
2. Users experience withdrawal symptoms when Internet game play ceases.
3. Tolerance is identified; increased video game engagement
4. Attempts to stop or reduce engagement with video games have failed.
5. Users loss interest in non-video game activities or hobbies.
6. Continued use or excessive use despite negative consequences.
7. Lying to others about use to others.
8. Engagement with Internet-based gaming used as a way to escape
9. Relationship difficulties or loss as a result of play.

So what can we do?

The Do's and Do Not's of treating IT addiction...

DO NOT...

- Invalidate their passion for technology or why it might be something worth enjoying
- Solely focus on what to take away
- Set unrealistic expectations/goals that do not take into account the neurobiology of addiction
- Pose yourself as being unaffected by technology (even in subtle ways)
- Avoid talking about the specifics (even if it feels uncomfortable)
- Make their addiction comfortable/let the “Cannibal” eat

It's not okay to be a Cannibal

And the National Intervention Team at Addiction Intervention Resources

DO...

- Acknowledge the good of technology
- Gain an understanding of why they love/are drawn to technology
 - Use this understanding to shed light on other activities that share these features
- Discuss the specifics (games, servers, social media platforms, types of pornography...etc.)
- Provide psychoeducation in regards to what addiction is
 - Neurobiology of addiction - how this informs the importance of detox
 - Understanding powerlessness and the differentiation between one's self and their addict self (cannibal)
- Explore consequences that can come from excessive technology use (involving family can be helpful in becoming aware of some of these consequences)

DO...

- Help them learn and practice coping skills
- Use their language
- Explore values
- Explore strengths
- Explore purpose (“why statement”)
- Identify top, middle, and bottom lines
- Practice pro-social behaviors and challenge antisocial behaviors
- Challenge manipulative behaviors
- Challenge the idea that in-person and online social interactions are the same (without invalidating the connections they have online)
- Identify layers of accountability
- Help establish “building blocks of life”
- Differentiate between intentional and unintentional technology use
- Address underlying trauma and/or other mental health concerns once the groundwork has been laid

Limbic Resonance

Limbic Resonance

“It refers to the energetic exchange that happens between two people who are interacting in a caring and safe relationship. Their interaction stimulates the release of certain neurochemicals in the limbic region of the brain” (Cash, 2011, para. 4).

- Connection with levels of anxiety and depression
- Lack of limbic resonance cycle
- Impact on child development
- “Intimacy Disorder”

(Cash, 2011; Lewis, Amini, & Lannon, 2000)

Speaking about connection with others...
